The Long March Spirit: A Lesson for Today's Youth

Every September, China holds National Defense Education Month. This year, the theme is "Carrying Forward the Spirit of the Long March, Building a Strong National Defense Together." But what does a historic journey from 90 years ago have to do with today's young people? The answer, educators say, is everything.

The Long March was a 12,500-kilometer journey made by the Red Army through mountains, rivers, and frozen lands. Soldiers faced hunger, illness, and constant battles. Many lost their lives, but those who survived never gave up. Their story has become the "Long March Spirit" — a symbol of courage, unity, and never giving up in the face of hardship.

At this year's opening ceremony in Beijing, students did not just listen to speeches. They visited exhibitions of military equipment. They took part in simulation training, trying simple military drills. They also heard stories from old soldiers about what it truly means to protect one's country. A student named Wang Lei said, "I used to think national defense was only for soldiers. Now I understand it is everyone's responsibility."

Why does this matter for students today? A teacher at the event explained, "We live in a peaceful time, but peace does not come easily. It is built and protected by those who are willing to sacrifice. When young people learn about the Long March, they learn to value what they have and to be ready to serve their country."

The lesson of the Long March is not just about history. It is about the spirit that every Chinese person should carry in their heart. In a fast-changing world, challenges will always come. But if we remember the courage of those who walked the Long March, we will have the strength to face any difficulty. As one saying goes, "The Long March is over, but the spirit of the Long March never ends."

Passage 2　纪念长征胜利 90 周年

The year 2026 marks the 90th anniversary of the victory of the Long March. To remember this extraordinary history, thirty young people from Macao traveled to Ruijin in Jiangxi, the starting point of the Long March. They retraced the old Red Army routes and visited historic revolutionary sites, getting a real, impressive lesson about the extraordinary years.

The Long March took place between 1934 and 1936. Over 86,000 Red Army soldiers set out to break through enemy blocks and escape continuous pursuit. They climbed 18 snow-covered mountains, crossed 24 rivers and struggled through deadly swamps. When they finally reached northern Shaanxi safely, more than 40,000 soldiers had sacrificed their lives for the revolutionary cause. It was their strong will, strict discipline and firm unity that helped them survive all hardships.

Now more than 600,000 people visit Long March memorial sites every year. Young people learn this history in fresh ways, including watching 5D movies and joining immersive "living-history walks" to experience soldiers' tough life personally.

The Long March was filled with suffering, yet it was also full of hope. Its spirit teaches teenagers to hold fast to faith and never give up when meeting troubles in daily life, and this precious spirit will always go on from generation to generation.

The year 2026 marks the 90th anniversary of the victory of the Long March. To remember this great event, a group of 30 young people from Macao traveled to Ruijin, Jiangxi—the starting point of the Long March. They walked the old Red Army paths and visited the historic sites. For many of them, this trip was a first-time, eye-opening experience.

The Long March took place from 1934 to 1936. The Red Army had to break through enemy lines and march across China to escape the enemy's pursuit. More than 86,000 soldiers started the journey. They climbed 18 snow mountains and crossed 24 rivers. They also walked through dangerous swamps (沼泽). By the time they reached safety, over 40,000 soldiers had lost their lives for the revolutionary cause.

How did the Red Army make it against all odds? The answer lies in their strong will. They carried heavy loads —guns, blankets, and cooking pots—on their backs. They slept in the open air and ate wild plants. They faced hunger and cold, but they never gave up. Historians believe that the soldiers' strong discipline (纪律) and their ability to stay united were the keys to their survival.

Today, every year over 600,000 people visit the Long March memorial (纪念的) sites. Young people learn about the Long March in new ways. Some watch 5D movies about it. Some take part in "living-history walks," where they sleep on the ground and eat simple meals just like the Red Army did. These activities help them better understand the hardship the Red Army faced.

What can the Long March teach us today? A local guide said, "The Long March was full of suffering, but it was also full of hope. It tells young people, no matter how hard life gets, if you keep trying and never give up, you can get through it." The spirit of the Long March lives on, encouraging new generations to face the "mountains and rivers" in their own lives.
